Identity, to me, is not a box, but a window. It doesn't confine one. It simply informs and frames how one sees the world. And while each of us are unique and our identities are unique, I believe the beauty of identity is in our ability to use it to form bonds and connections, discovering the parts of ourselves that we share, in spite of our many differences. That's the beauty of being human, and having multidimensional identities. We're more similar than different. So, I did not mean this picture to be a representation, but a mirror.

When you look in his eyes, can you see yourself?
