Amelia's Detour

with thanks to Dave Anderson, Patty Fernandez, and Carl Safina

She's called Amelia, this albatross they've fitted with a transmitter to help them track her foraging, far from the speck of land where her chick grows fast, perpetually hungry.

From these tropical waters—azure, dazzling, unfruitful—Amelia and her mate feed their chick by starving themselves. Flying fish, fish eggs; none of it enough, until, carved lighter and lighter, she feels one day—mid-foray—a shift; hears in her blood a whisper out of many lives, many ends, to say her death will gain the chick nothing.

Then, poised on an eight-foot wingspan she turns, flies hard, straight north a thousand miles. The trackers' maps let us arrive with her at cold water green with oxygen and plankton; waves roiling with squid. At last, she spears survival with her beak, swallows again, again, filling into herself.

Nearly a week before she beelines south—no way to know if her mate's been tending the store—but yes, their chick lives, rushes Amelia open-mawed for a share from her detour. He lives, and will need more. Minutes later, aloft again, she's studying the ocean swells for signs.
