Fox

She travels the border on this side of the windbreak of farm and open meadow and, between the time I look out the front window, place my bowl of soup on the table, lift my head again, moves, releases herself to the wind, springs on black-furred feet so quick, so deliberate in the rhythm of graceful bounds, her light red coat, stretched full length, the white bib of her chest barely visible in its invisibility. I am left breathless by the four leaps that take her to an opening among clumps of leafless honeysuckle where she slips into dusk, turning silver as she springs, rapturous, into mind, into body, this everlasting moment passing as it passes into the miraculous.

"I started reading Appalachia for the accident reports, but I kept reading for the great features."—Mohamed Ellozy, subscriber
