Milk Snake

Your colors blend with dirt and flecked leaf litter, your patterned loops marked beside the warm brick of the porch steps where we found you at noon in full sun;

 the tact of your name, taken from legend—where you sucked

 the udders of pastured cows; and your nickname farmer's friend, ridding barn and field of insects to benefit a stout crop. Today when I watch, you bask in your warm spot, your full arm's length only three-quarters in view, tail still under the last layer of siding. I step a touch too near;

you reel in flesh and scales, a jack-in-a-box who rids our home of rodents, met in the vise-

grips of jaws
and your body's sinewy muscles.

Tonight when I flick
on the porch light, you will slide away in a fluid s from beneath my shadow, sweeping your length over a crackle of leaves.
