Cormorants at Chambers Bay stand watch from an abandoned deck, a broken-down cabin with its blurry window.

They perch at the end of the pier on battered posts
still as stones, rest from the long night, abide. At twilight they stir, composure turning to duty.

 No matter the moon,
feeding commences when darkness falls.
Their wings, swift as a full wind, lift with grace, enter midnight fields of abundance, plunder the sable depths.
They consume the night tethered to elements of the sea, a dark antiquity they know by heart.

A crimson curve rims the dawn when feeding ends.
The shimmering wings circle the pier, descend to feed the young, disgorge the spoil of primal dark.

"I started reading Appalachia for the accident reports, but I kept reading for the great features."—Mohamed Ellozy, subscriber
