Winterkill

Because the day disrobes, discards scarf and sweater, exposing April's white skin, I go singing into the longer light, walking and fishing and gathering the bright red teaberries that grow sweeter through the cold months and now taste like fresh mint cut from a summer garden. And in this I find the bones of animals who starved. or were run down by coyotes or wild dogs leaping over the deeper snow, who also felt hunger gnawing at their bones. Here the rib of a yearling doe points up through the canopy of May apples, while near the stream the skull of a porcupine sleeps in a deathbed of quills, softened by the petals of the first yellow violets.

"I started reading Appalachia for the accident reports, but I kept reading for the great features."—Mohamed Ellozy, subscriber
