Wild Falling

Eyes frozen in headlights for only a moment, the herd of deer traverses the road in this first winter blizzard with such prudence they quiet the wild falling. One after another, they spring to clear the ice-sheathed barbed wire hurdle, that quivers from time to time when one of their hooves grazes against it. They bound into the meadow, filling with white fire, an icy afterglow burnishing their tracks, that cross and re-cross themselves, while wisps of cloud wash over the moon.
