Wood Path

A doe browses in a small clearing of yellow weeds and pampas grass.
Soft rain dapples her tan coat. She leads two fawns no larger than spaniels, pauses, ears alert, then bends to the tansy leaves.

The fawns press at her side.
One stares when it sees me, spots on the tawny coat like snow. They munch the mayweed, disappear behind a hedge of nettles.

Two bucks appear from a cluster of birch, follow the doe to low-hanging leaves of honey locust.
They work their way along the salal shrubs,
leave oleander and lamb's ear untouched.

The deer drift so close I can see light in the onyx dark of their deft eyes—mountain lakes and a crescent moon.
