Blueberry Island

A smallish mound of earth and rock left when flood water receded.

Above a cedar waxwing flirts from branch to branch, then pauses

as though eavesdropping.
Wings crimped like a Japanese fan,

its maw open waiting to feed, be fed?
Sweet pepper bush perfumes the air.

White bells promise fruit to come,
the tang of wild blueberries on our tongues.

Others have been here, docked up in the sheltering cove, bringing drunkenness, leaving broken glass, crumpled cans, young trees hacked down to fuel some feckless fire.

For now, we bask like milk snakes storing up heat for the long haul.
