For now,

they merge with waves, hundreds of Canada Geese lifting, disappearing with gusts that streak a blue sky black, test the old oak's foothold at the pond's edge, whirr through firs in the dry air.

New ice allows no carp to leap, no painted turtle to sun along the fallen trunk, no snake to test the trail.

All color gone, leaves spiral back upwards, chickadees call across great distances.

A single cormorant claims the cove where summer swans once nested in down, left deep imprints in tall grass, now all leveled in frozen flatness.

Harp-strings of ice laced straight over the dam surprise me, as does my effort to listen for their soft tones, and to hear them.

"I started reading Appalachia for the accident reports, but I kept reading for the great features."—Mohamed Ellozy, subscriber
